Read the following text then choose the right answer for each question.

It is increasingly common for multinational businesses to send employees on international assignments, but without the right cross-cultural skills, staff will often struggle. In order to be successfully transferred, employees must understand the host country culture. Colleagues from different countries might share similar professional knowledge and skills within a single international organization, but their ways of working, social skills, body language and ways of doing business are likely to be completely different. They may have different patterns of behavior which need to be understood and appreciated in order for everyone to work together successfully. For example, while it may be acceptable for Chinese office workers in Hong Kong to use the door- close button on a lift no matter how many people are also getting in, doing such a thing in London would make people extremely angry. It is common for South Africans to ask personal questions of their counterparts shortly after being introduced, while a British colleague may perceive this as impolite and inappropriate. Latin Americans' need for personal space is much less than that of their British colleagues. Cultural awareness is much more than simply knowing about a country's history and geography. It is about understanding how and why cultures work differently. It is also important to understand your own cultural make-up in order to work more effectively, maximize teamwork and strengthen global competence.

Starbucks' Chief Executive Jim Donald - who has presided over a 50 percent decline in the retailer's share price in the last 12 months - is to be replaced by founder and Chairman Howard Schultz. His appointment comes after a dark 12 months for Starbucks, which has seen it lose out to rivals such as Dunkin' Donuts and McDonald's, who have begun to replicate its success. Schultz is now set to slow the expansion of the retailer's growth in the US, closing under- performing stores in direct response to the slowing North American economy. Instead, he will focus on the company's international plans, using money originally earmarked for US store openings for its global expansion plans. Fast-food giant McDonald's is set to take on Starbucks in the competitive coffee market, with plans to open coffee bars across the United States. McDonald's, until now better known for Big Mac burgers than its beverages, yesterday detailed plans to roll out coffee bars complete with their own 'baristas' in its near-14, 000 North American stores. Although there is no fixed timescale for the roll-out, trials are already under way, and it is believed the push could add $1 bn a year to McDonald's $21.6 bn of annual sales. The aim is to compete head-to-head with Starbucks in the ever- increasing brewed coffee market. The trial involves recruiting 'baristas'-a term made famous by Starbucks - to stores, where espresso machines are displayed at the counter, so allowing customers to actually see the drinks being made. This is in direct contrast to McDonald's traditional approach, where products tend to be made out of sight from the consumer.

Sir Lindsay Owell-Jones does not like being photographed. 'Do I have to smile?' he says gruffly. He exudes the air of a man who has done this many, many times before. Such expertise derives from the fact that Sir Lindsay is frequently photographed with models, girls far taller than he is, who wear lipstick, eyeshadow and nail polish made by L'Oreal, the company he has worked for since 1969. For nearly 20 years, he was Chief Executive of L'Oreal, the world's biggest beauty company and owner of brands such as Maybelline, Redken, Lancôme and Vichy. Although he stepped back from the day-to-day running of the company two years ago, handing over the job to Jean-Paul Agon, he remains Chairman. Sir Lindsay, who turns 62 this month, has spent the better part of his life trying to convince women and men that buying L'Oreal's lotions and shampoos will make them feel good. L'Oreal is a curious destination for a man who had 'no intention' of taking a job in the consumer goods industry. Yet he was drawn to the beauty company. 'It was still quite a small company, but was thought to be going places and was considered a great example of creative marketing and original advertising campaigns. Cosmetics is a business of intuition. Consumers don't tell you what they need; you've got to guess.'

7. You have to guess what your customers need.
